

Teachers don't have to teach class during the winter and summer vacations. If they do not engage in other work during these periods, are they considered unemployed?

No. Teachers are inherently compensated workers, and temporarily do not engage in work only because of seasonal reasons (time off during the winter and summer vacations); they must consequently still be considered employed.